Making reasonable adjustments at work for people with mental health problems
A SOLUTIONS GUIDE FROM SAMH

This guide is designed to provide straightforward information for employers and employees on making reasonable adjustments in the workplace for people with mental health problems. It looks at how you could go about making adjustments, why you would want to do so and where you can get help and support.
1. It’s the law

The Equality Act 2010 has a requirement for employers to make reasonable adjustments for people with disabilities, to enable them to do their jobs.

The Act says that a person is disabled if:

- they have a mental or physical impairment
- this has substantial and long-term adverse effects on a person’s ability to do normal day-to-day activities

You should also be aware of your duty to conduct risk assessments. You can download the Health and Safety Executive’s Five Steps to Risk Assessment from www.hse.gov.uk.

2. It can help your business

Research commissioned by SAMH found that in 2010, sickness absence due to mental health problems involved a cost of almost £690 million to Scotland’s employers:

Making reasonable adjustments doesn’t have to be expensive: the Disability Rights Commission found that most adjustments cost nothing, and the average cost is £75. Where costs are incurred, you may be able to get a grant from Jobcentre Plus’s Access to Work scheme to cover them.

At least 1 in 6 of us at work experience common mental health problems such as depression and anxiety. Research from our friends at See Me reveals that 48% of people don’t tell their employers about their mental health, they are supported when they do and problems can be addressed before they become a crisis – this will help you retain staff and decrease sickness absence. One of the ways to create a mentally healthy workplace culture is to focus on staff well-being. Visit www.samh.org.uk for more information.

3. It’s the right thing to do

Making a few small changes to enable a member of staff to continue doing their job is far less expensive than having to recruit and train a new person. It also ensures that the company retains the employee’s knowledge and skills. One in four of us will experience a mental health problem at some point, so this is an issue that affects all employers.

We know that most people with mental health problems do want to work. But we also know that people with serious mental health problems have the lowest employment rate of any group of people with disabilities, with 79% not in employment. There are a number of reasons for this, including stigma and misunderstanding, an inflexible benefits system, and a lack of available training and learning to support people into work. Evidence suggests that the right work in the right environment can be beneficial for mental health, and can help people’s recovery.

Work is a key part of life, and our self-esteem and life experiences are inextricably tied up with our ability to earn a living. It is wrong to deny people the opportunity to do so.

See Me, Scotland’s campaign against the stigma and discrimination associated with mental health problems has a section dedicated to the workplace, for more information visit www.seemescotland.org/workplace

References
1. What’s it Worth Now? SAMH, 2010
2. Disability Rights Commission, Top Tips for Small Employers
WHAT IS A REASONABLE ADJUSTMENT?

Starting to discuss reasonable adjustments

The first step in making reasonable adjustments for someone with a mental health problem is to have an open and supportive discussion. Reasonable adjustments should be reviewed and agreed in consultation with the member of staff or applicant. Every reasonable adjustment is unique to the individual’s specific needs and abilities, and the requirements of the employer.

Although mental health problems are very common – affecting one in four people in Scotland – there is still stigma and discrimination towards people with mental health problems, as well as many myths about what different diagnoses mean. Some mental health problems can be periodic: a person can experience long periods when they are well, but may then experience a further period of difficulty. The times when they are unwell will not always be the same, but there may be symptoms or issues that are common. So rather than agreeing one or more specific adjustments that will apply all the time, it may be more helpful to agree adjustments that can be implemented when they are needed, and revoked when they are not.

In order for reasonable adjustments to be constructive, they must focus on what the person can do – not on what they can’t. It is also important that you do not make promises that you are unable to keep: be realistic.

This section suggests areas where you could make reasonable adjustments. Not all of them will be suitable for your workplace, and it is not an exhaustive list: there may well be others that your staff would like you to consider. Remember: if you are not sure what will help someone – ask them!

At the recruitment/induction stage

• Adjust recruitment processes. You could provide more time for tests, assignments or interviews, allow applicants to come in early to orient themselves, and/or provide a quiet area for applicants to wait in, rather than a busy reception.

• Amend your induction. Tell your new employee about your standard induction and ask if there are any areas that might cause them difficulties. If so, could you adjust the process, without reducing its effectiveness? For example, you could offer a mentor, arrange additional support for the first few months, agree a longer induction process, and/or provide induction information in writing as well as verbally.

Working hours or patterns

• Allow variations in working hours or flexible working. There are many reasons why someone might need to adjust their hours. They might need to access a service that is only available during working hours, or they might find it difficult to function in the morning, perhaps as a result of prescribed medication, but be able to work well later in the day. Just moving someone’s start and finish time ahead by an hour might make all the difference to their ability to do their job well.

• Allow several short breaks instead of one main lunch break. Some people might have difficulty in concentrating for long periods: breaking up their working day differently could help.

• Permit more breaks at certain times. If someone is doing particularly stressful work, could you increase the frequency or duration of their breaks to allow them time to recover?

Physical Environment

• Allow the person to change their workplace. For some people, noisy environments might adversely affect their mental health at times: could they work somewhere else?

• Ensure access to natural light and fresh air. Many people benefit from sitting near to a window, particularly if they are able to open it to allow fresh air to circulate.

• Move their workstation. Would it be helpful to be based in another position – e.g., so their back didn’t face the door?

• Provide a quiet space for breaks. A quiet place away from the main workspace is helpful for many people.

SAMH can provide advice or training on reasonable adjustments for people with mental health problems. For further information contact us at:

SAMH, Brunswick House, 51 Wilson Street, Glasgow G1 1UZ
Telephone: 0141 530 1000 Email: enquire@samh.org.uk www.samh.org.uk
WORKING PRACTICES

- You might be unsure about how to support when there are changes in an employee’s mental health. It could help to discuss this when the person is well, and agree how you will support them with any recurrence of mental health problems.

- Agree changes to communication methods. For some people, there may be times when it is hard to communicate face-to-face. At these times, you could agree that they can communicate by email, or work from home.

- Allow changes to tasks when needed. When a person is unwell or has just returned from a period of absence, it may be helpful for them to focus on a particular type of task.

- Could they swap some tasks with a colleague, or work to a different job description for a time? This can help to rebuild confidence.

- Provide more support when needed. Many employers already require regular meetings between line managers and staff. If you don’t, you could consider introducing them as an adjustment, and if you do, it might be helpful to increase the frequency of these meetings at certain times. Sometimes all that’s needed is time to talk things through.

- Implement a “mentoring” system. Some employees might find it helpful to have a coach or mentor for a time, to provide advice, guidance or support.

- Agree an early approach. Some people might want to ask a specific colleague to highlight to them if their behaviour starts to change in a way that suggests their mental health is deteriorating. This can help in identifying when pre-agreed adjustments should be put in place.

OTHER USEFUL ACTIONS

- Provide training for managers and supervisors. Managers and supervisors need to know that they can make reasonable adjustments, and be familiar with their company’s policy in this area. Training can help them to know when they can negotiate a reasonable adjustment directly with an employee, and when they need to involve the HR department or more senior staff.

- Train your staff in mental health awareness. This might help them to deal constructively with colleagues who may be experiencing mental health problems, and also to recognise issues with their own mental health at an early stage.

- Communicate your policies to staff. It is important to make clear that reasonable adjustments are not about unfair advantages or favouritism, but are a way of removing barriers preventing people with disabilities from making a full contribution in the workplace – or sometimes from contributing at all.

- Let staff know it’s okay to talk about mental health. There is still a lot of stigma around mental health problems, which may make staff reluctant to tell someone they need an adjustment. Set out clearly what will happen when someone discloses a mental health problem.

- Be clear about what you need to know. Staff should not feel they have to disclose every aspect of their mental health problem. Your discussions should focus on the problems they are experiencing in the workplace, and what actions can be taken to address them.

- Tell only those who need to know about the adjustments being made, with the consent of the person. Making reasonable adjustments does not mean that you need to tell other staff about the person’s disability.

CREATING A MENTALLY HEALTHY WORKPLACE

Of course, you don’t have to wait until an employee needs a reasonable adjustment to start making your workplace more mentally healthy. A mentally healthy workplace takes care of staff and nurtures a supportive environment for work. We all have mental health in the same way we have physical health, and it’s important we take the time to look after it.

There are 3 key areas that you can incorporate, through your existing policy and processes, which will support this:

What if things go wrong?

- Establishing a mental health conscious culture. For example, promoting good mental health practices such as operating flexible working hours so that employees can balance the demands of home life with work will create a more positive working environment.

- Providing opportunities for staff learning and education. For example, encouraging staff to talk openly about mental health through events and corporate activities which promote good mental wellbeing.

- Identifying the support that is available. For example, making sure that your staff are aware of the resources and support that you have in place, such as HR staff, Occupational Health, an Employee Assistance Programme (EAP) and external sources of support to help them when they need support for their mental wellbeing.

You might also want to consider participating in the Healthy Working Lives Awards Scheme. As well as being good practice, this can support your organisational in achieving culture change throughout the whole organisation which promotes and supports good mental wellbeing in your workforce.
WHERE CAN I GET HELP AND ADVICE?

Contact SAMH for general information on making reasonable adjustments. The following organisations and resources may also be helpful.

Business Gateway
Provides advice on legislation and employer responsibilities as well as stress management.
www.bgateway.com

Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development
Guidance on developing a mental health policy and creating a mentally healthy workplace.
www.cipd.co.uk

Commission for Equality and Human Rights
Provides advice and guidance to businesses on equality issues and incorporates responsibilities previously held by Disability Rights Commission.
www.equalityhumanrights.com

Business Disability Forum
Disability Membership organisation providing guidance and support in employing people with a disability.
www.businessdisabilityforum.org.uk

Directgov
Information on the Access to Work Scheme which can provide practical and financial support in addressing barriers to work for disabled people. Contact the Disability Employment Adviser at your local Jobcentre for advice.
www.direct.gov.uk

Mindout (A line managers resource)
A Practical Guide to Managing Mental Health in the Workplace.
www.mindfulemployer.net

Healthy Working Lives
Healthy Working Lives awards can be gained at bronze, silver and gold levels, and are awarded to employers who can demonstrate that they meet the criteria.
www.healthyworkinglives.com

See Me
Scotland’s campaign against the stigma and discrimination associated with mental health problems. See Me has a specific section on its website for the workplace, which includes information and resources.
www.seemescotland.org.uk

ACAS
Provide information, advice, training, conciliation and other services for employers and employees to help prevent or resolve workplace problems.
www.acas.org.uk

SAMH
Provides information, advice and training on being mentally healthy at work and managing mental health in the workplace.
www.samh.org.uk